Perils of the Highway.

From the Boston Post.

The meeting presented by Col. Sohler at the recent meeting of the American Automobile Association, regarding accidents incurred in the operation of power vehicles upon the highways in Massachusetts, are interesting. As statistics from the highway commission's records they are indisputable; but of what are they conclusive? It appears that the 10,000 street railway cars killed or injured 8,339 persons, including their occupants, last year, while only 4,292 were thus harmed in automobile accidents. This would seem to permit the inference that the trolley is far more perilous.

Considering further the fact that there are perhaps ten times as many autos in private use in the state as the number of trolley cars upon the public lines, the discrepancy appears very noticeable.

But looking at it from another angle, it is seen that of the number killed or injured by the trolleys only 1,491 were hit or run over outside, the 7,000 others being passengers; while the autos, on the other hand, killed or injured 3,941. It is difficult to formulate very definite conclusions from these figures. In a word, it may be seen that the electric railways are more dangerous to ride upon and the automobiles the more difficult to dodge.

Best Laid Plans.

Madge—if he's such a fine swimmer, why don't you pretend to be drowning? Marjorie—I tried that once, and the wrong young man rescued me.

Queen Victoria lived 29,828 days, or five days longer than the oldest of her predecessors, George III. Each was born on May 24.
